1 out of every 40 attacks target a law firm or insurance provider.

5 prominent law firms were targeted by bad actors in under a month.

300 clients were impacted in the Convington & Burling law firm breach, inciting legal recourse by the United States Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC).

5 would-be class actions were filed so far this year over alleged law firm cyberattacks.

Bad actors frequently target law firms because of the valuable, sensitive information they maintain.

According to Bloomberg Law, breaking news on data breaches has become an almost weekly occurrence with headlines on hackers accessing different data types including personal client information, financial documents, contracts, court filings, depositions, and payment information. Because most law firms make client data accessible across their group, they face challenges balancing security needs and sharing data—a security conundrum for many legal groups. Firms are actively facing legal suits themselves from clients after personal details were compromised.
